IV. Introduction

The social and professional activation is a set of many complementary activities. They are aimed at bringing people in the mainstream of the contemporary society. Evoking motivation, increasing the level of life skills, and social competences enable people to get involved in the social life, to enter or reenter the job market and to bring about the professional activation. Once it is achieved, then it makes sense to increase the key professional competences that make it possible to gain new skills and qualifications and consequently lead to active professional life. Professional activation is not only about the particular activities aiming at entering the job market but it is also about creating a constructive attitude towards individual professional situation.

There are different mechanisms enhancing the professional activation. These mechanisms have been essentially defined in Ustawa o promocji zatrudnienia i instytucjach rynku pracy [The Act on Promotion of Employment and Labour Market Institutions] and for people with the disabilities it has been defined in Ustawie o zatrudnieniu i rehabilitacji osób niepełnosprawnych [Act on Employment and Rehabilitation of People with Disabilities]. Notwithstanding, these two Acts do not include the extensive offer of the institutions devoted to social rescue. The social and professional activation is not the working method used exclusively by the institutions of the labour market.

The concept of the activation is particularly vital in social pedagogy. Stimulating the individual activities and shaping its creative role in local community are the key interest areas of social pedagogy. Helena Radlińska perceived the activation of the individuals who are able to change the reality as the superior aim of social pedagogy. The activation has become the working method of the education, preventive, rehabilitation and readaptation institutions. It has become the way of an effective individual's support in overcoming the barriers preventing the full participation in the social life. The issue of effectiveness of activities within widely understood concept of social rescue has been debated for years in the social context. The participants of this discussion vary in their opinions on the conditions favouring the alleged effectiveness. What is interesting, these differences are particularly visible in the fields traditionally researched by the theorists and practitioners of this issue. It seems that for a long time these both groups have been trying to put forward their solutions concerning this problem. They promote the proposals which they created and claim they have the monopoly for correctness. It leads to situations where the common ground of the theory and practice is often questioned¹. This problem was well reflected by M. Maffesoli "the antinomy of the scientific thinking and the common sense seems to stem from the nature of things. Obviously, for the first one the second one is uncertain: even if it is not classified as the "false consciousness" the common sense is at least silly. The aforementioned scorn for anima candida is considered in the world of science as the criterion of the intellectual attitude"². The dispute continues and nothing indicates its immediate termination. Some findings and warnings do not bring solution to the problem and such attitude "does not bring truth about the human, and the malicious Demiurge appears in this abstract and idealized background and the common drive to reveal the human secret of existence, fate and mercy."³.

Nonetheless, both the theorists and practitioners of the social rescue agree with the fact that Polish organizational, formal and legal solutions have low systematic approach in the process of supporting the people threatened with social exclusion. The need of interdisciplinary analysis and solution of the problem is needed. It is all about creating the conditions favouring the effective help provided for those who are being excluded or have already been excluded. Meanwhile, such efficiency and standards are too often of simply instrumental character. The arguments are provided to support the necessity of change or to maintain the status quo of the currently provided support. It means that there is a social and political drive rather than the paradigm of acting towards well-being, happiness, hope or simple life success of the people threatened with social exclusion.

The situation described above justifies the need of creating the possibilities of taking up such a interdisciplinary, inter-environmental discourse over the concept of social and professional activation of the people threatened with social exclusion and those socially excluded. This conference is going to focus on this task.

V. Plan of the conference:

Pursuant to Ustawa o promocji zatrudnienia i instytucjach rynku pracy [The Act on Promotion of Employment and Labour Market Institutions] people in a particular situation include i.e.: the unemployed women who did not take up any job after giving birth to a child; the long-term unemployed; people with disabilities; people under the age of 25; people over the age of 50. These groups lie within the interests of a wide range of activities of social rescue and the social and professional activation is one of many forms of their work. Therefore, it is suggested that the issue of the conference focus on the following areas:

- social and professional activation of the youth,
- social and professional activation of the unemployed,
- social and professional activation of the people with disabilities,
- social and professional activation of the elderly people.

The conference will embark three forms of activities:

1. scientific plenary session and discussion panels (the proceedings will include presenting the papers and releases during the discussion, the thematic sections will be arranged according to the number of the applications),
2. practical training workshops (separately certified),
3. examples of good practices – study visits at chosen institutions.

There is a possibility of enrolling in every form of offered activities separately.
